In addition, this student-centered approach allows students to form a positive math identity through their elementary years.

Teachers focus learning goals on fluency over time, give students opportunities to engage in productive struggle and discourse by building engaging, student-centered learning opportunities.

What teachers are saying about their students': "A big part of what we've looked at this year, and worked to instill in students, is student-agency. Asking the questions then letting students do the thinking. Be more of a guide than a lecturer. Having them work in teams and share their learning orally. For many of my students this shows up in longer retention of the steps and strategies needed to solve problems."

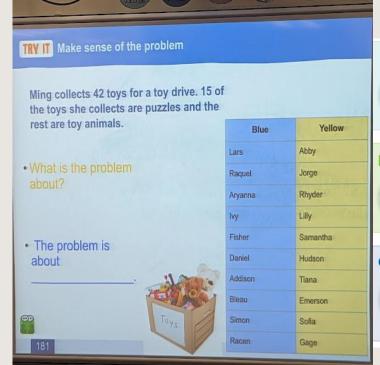

- 1 Make sense of the problem.
- 2 Solve and support your thinking.

- Share your thinking with a partner.
- Compare strategies.

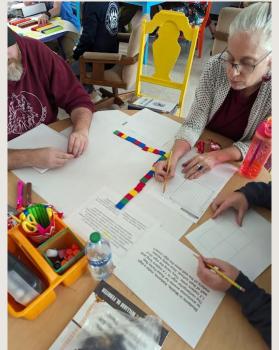

Connect

- Make connections and reflect on what you have learned.
- 6 Apply your thinking to new problems.

"I have seen stronger collaboration between student along with stronger math vocabulary."

What our teachers are saying

"Working collaboratively with other teachers in the district has opened up our path to successful strategies and student engagement. Helping each other and sharing ideas, having a say in the professional development needed to enhance the curriculum and developing meaningful relationships within the district."

What our teachers are saying standards based more deliberate in planning work collaboratively growth higher level thinking

"i-Ready curriculum was new to 6th grade this year. Jenn provided a full day of training on using the resources, planning the lessons, and instilling critical thinking strategies into the activities. Having also worked on the math team with her, we've been able to create teacher-led opportunities to encourage and guide our grade level teams in their math instruction."

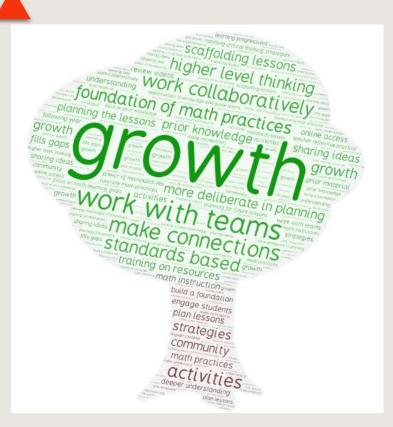

"Working with the Math TOSA has helped me tremendously. I came in half way through the year last year with no prior teaching background and zero background in math outside of my own K-12 experience. Jenn helped be build a foundation of concrete math practices and strategies. How to engage students, break apart lesson, build on prior understandings and learn the power of manipulatives. My understanding and growth is all owed to my Math TOSA."

What our teachers are saying

"Having been diagnosed with dyslexia during my education, I was forced to use different strategies and resources in order to be successful. Throughout my teaching career, as I had to learn new processes and new curriculums, I have continued to utilize these skills. Jenn Loseke has been an invaluable resource. I have been working with her regularly for the last year and a half and both my students as myself have benefited from this relationship as I have become a more a proficient math teacher and my students have shown consistent growth."

Thank you!!
